Recombination (cosmology) - Wikipedia

In cosmology, recombination refers to the epoch at which charged electrons and protons first became bound to form electrically neutral hydrogen atoms. Recombination occurred about 378,000 years [citation needed] after the Big Bang (at a redshift of $z = 70031100000000000001100$).

The hotspot conversion paradox - CORE

Recombination is important for: Genetic reshuffling during sexual reproduction creating new allele combinations within chromosomes and ensuring proper segregation of chromosomes.

How large was the universe at the moment of recombination ...

This question seems to be assuming that the size of the observable Universe equals the age of the Universe times the speed of light. This is a very common and reasonable assumption, but also an incorrect one, due to the expansion of space.
